

History is a series of explosions.

We are all crops in an abandoned garden.

The civilization did not die of war or famine. It died of exhaustion.

When Man perishes then God too dies.

Adam's the Creator, Creation is God.

I love nighttimes, when the world becomes exactly what it always was.

In the quiet, you can hear the world telling all the secrets it was too shy to speak in the sun.

In a world where you don't need to work to survive, work becomes a religion.

It is a society where exposure and influence are literal currency.

A thousand years of bone, stacked high to protect a line drawn by a god whose afternoon needed filling.

It's nighttime and the poets and thieves are awake, their hearts beating in time with something the daylight world has forgotten.

They crave unearned emotional extremes and ultimate control.

It is a piece of hostile architecture designed to look like a friendly gesture.

The smile was the performance. The hate was the reality.

It was a masterpiece of nothing. A list of things impossible to disagree with and impossible to deliver.

The market doesn't reward cleverness; it rewards clarity.

Sleep is just a beta test for death.

Aesthetics are the only thing holding society together.

The midnight dark is heaven's light.

In secret rooms with velvet walls, we bargain dreams as evening falls.

Where every shadow hid a lie, and every truth was born to die.

We shed our skins in twilight's hush, our scars like constellations blush.

Her soul a grave of words unsaid, her mind a boulevard of dread.

Grey kills love, don't let it get close.

These ecstasies though fleet in haste like summer nights, too dear to waste.
Small hesitations suit the house now.
She hated clutter, but now even the ashtray feels arranged.
She always wanted the kind of silence that doesn't require approval.
We kept the other kind—the silence of shared rooms, the hush before someone apologizes.
Some months earn their permanence.
She came to me in the hour of nothingness.
She saw me not the man I paraded, but the shaking one, unkempt in soul.
She treated me as though I were already saved.
She loved not with conditions nor with whims, but with a terrifying consistency.
To drink water with her was to taste spring.
Even angels must sometimes walk away.
She was the best thing I ever held, and I hold nothing now.
I do not command you, I only whisper.
I carried your silence through checkpoints, hid your breath inside my coat.
Each night I boiled tea for two. One cup cooled.
You are not a bird, and I do not cage you.
The world did not owe you peace. But I do.
Come back, and I will not ask where you've been.
You don't make love, you obliterate.
If this is hell then burn me whole.
Even to have been loved by someone like her is enough to make a sinner believe he was once holy.
I want to bury my face in you, until language turns to sweat.
You forget where you end and I begin.

They trade in hearts with smiles so dull.

Wanderer now seems like a bad substitute for homeless.

The branches you once sang from have turned to ash in your absence.

It is a rat race of the soul.

Like I could hide behind pretty words, and say to the distorted figure in the mirror, I'm beautiful.

Death isn't as final as you think.

They're not asking for a good relationship; they're asking for a total fantasy takeover.

The dead don't come, and the dead don't cry.

Each word is affection's fees.

Because nothing sacred ever felt this right.

Romance, like good writing, might actually require depth. And that, my friends, is terrifying.

They worship the richness of their own thought.

I'd die for you, but we would live.

Maybe your sins wore down your tongue. Maybe you choked on hearts you broke.

Or you'll be dead before you're dead.

A cupid's death and no one cries, as if his arrow was of lies.

We've been selling our hearts to travelers.

These shackles are not your bracelets.

A nightingale tore off her throat, for there's nothing worth singing of.

Come ruin this globe, build it anew.